From The Editor

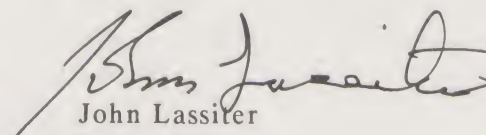

Dear Members,

It hardly seems possible that it has been three years since the inception of this journal. Your support, patience, and understanding have been an encouragement to me and the Editorial Board from the very beginning.

At first, we hoped and envisioned that Muscogiana would be a quarterly publication. As the reality of finances set in, the frequency of publication became irregular. The journal will continue to be published on a biannual basis in June and December for the foreseeable future. Increases in printing costs have also forced us to reduce the total number of pages in each issue and use smaller type. Sources of additional funding are being investigated at this time, and if obtained, will enable us to increase our content.

I would again like to thank each of you who has contributed to the Publication Fund and those of you who have contributed material for publication.

Sincerely,

John Lassiter

Theodore Fogle

An Uncommon Soldier's Experience in the Columbus Guards during the Civil War

By Tom McRae

I fired only once and that was at a bunch of six or seven Yankees not more than 60 yards off. The musket was a smooth bore & loaded with a ball & three buckshot. I won't say whether I hit my mark or not. Mother, I'll give you the benefit of the doubt.¹

In late September of 1862, at the Battle of Sharpsburg, Maryland, Theodore Fogle was one of barely four hundred Georgians assigned to defend the bridge that spanned Antietam Creek. Poised against them on the opposite side of the creek were 12,500 Union soldiers under General Ambrose Burnside who had been instructed by General George McClellan to take the bridge "at all hazards."² But, after four and a half hours of fighting, the small group of sharpshooting Rebels still held the bridge despite being overwhelmingly outnumbered. The Yankees eventually captured the bridge. When recounting the events of the battle in a letter home to his parents, Theodore proudly asserted that the Confederates had to leave the bridge only because their supply of ammunition was exhausted, not because the Union troops outfought them.

Theodore's participation in the battle of Antietam Creek and the letter to his parents about his involvement there revealed important aspects about his character and how it shaped his experience during the Civil War. The history of the battle served to display Theodore's bravery under fire, thereby, giving insight to the depth of his commitment to fight for the Confederacy. The letter embodied his desire to tell about his dramatic battlefield experiences, but also carried his ever-present, overriding tone of caution. While he earnestly wanted to convey the excitement and danger of the battlefield, he refrained from writing every detail of his experience. The battle called for great bravery from all of its participants, but Theodore could not have written an accurate depiction of the battlefield action in his letters home for fear of unnerving his mother. In the letter he buffered his mother from the details by writing that he had only taken one shot, and then declining to tell her if he had hit his mark. The Battle of Antietam Creek provided a glimpse of the characteristics that defined and molded Theodore's experience as a soldier in the Civil War.

Theodore Turner Fogle was born on January 16, 1834, in Milledgeville, Georgia. Shortly thereafter, his family moved to the west Georgia town of Columbus where they would stay for the rest of their lives. Theodore was the product of a solid middle class upbringing. His father, Jacob, was a well-respected dentist in town. Together he and his wife, Nancy, had seven children: three girls and four boys. Theodore was the oldest child in the patriarchal family.³ The Fogles owned seven slaves⁴ and held almost five hundred acres of land in the Muscogee county area.⁵ However, Doctor Fogle belonged to the class of professionals. His principal occupation was dentistry, not planting. While he did own slaves and land, he did not own enough of either to crack into the ranks of the planter elite that were present in that area of Western Georgia that extended to the banks of the Chattahoochee River.

Theodore received an excellent education. In his late teens, he attended the Georgia Military Institute, and later received his formal dental training at a school in Baltimore, Maryland. Through both experiences during the course of his education, Theodore developed many of the admirable characteristics as a boy that he would carry with him into the Civil War as a man. His years at the Georgia Military Institute provided an excellent military background, but it also instilled a firm resolve in Theodore to never quit an unfinished assignment, even under the harshest of circumstances. With this ability, Theodore was able to cope with almost any type of adversity. While undergoing the regimen of tiresome drilling, Theodore displayed the endurance that would make him a dependable soldier for the Confederacy. "I have to hold my musket out sometimes so long and get so tired that I fell almost ready to throw it down and give up, but I manage to hold on somehow or another."⁶

During his time at dental school in Maryland, Theodore revealed his intense devotion to his family. He was always eager to receive mail from home. When the correspondence became sparse, he begged his mother to write him regularly.⁷ It was also while at dental school that he first displayed his uncanny ability to manipulate the worst possible circumstances into optimistic result. This was particularly true with his reaction to his cousin Marian's refusal to accept his proposal to marry. Instead of dwelling on the rejection from his true love, he simply responded, "ah well I reckon it's for the best."⁸ With a shrug of his shoulders, Theodore downplayed his failure. He would remain single for the rest of his life. He frequently wrote about his cousin Marian, fondly recalling their past meetings, but never condemning her decision not to marry him.

It was with this same naivete that Theodore entered the Civil War. He was swept up in the euphoria of the pre-war weeks. Like his inability to influence his potential bride, Theodore was also inept at controlling the effects of the whirlwind of activity surrounding him. All of the decisions surrounding his involvement in the war were made for him. It was only proper that a good Southerner would go to fight for the Confederacy. For Theodore, the Civil War was localized to the simplistic notion of rebels fighting the evil yankees. He was never able to comprehend the larger scope of the conflict, whether it was for southern nationalism or the preservation of slavery. Taking into account his mindset as he marched into war, it would not have been surprising to hear him blithely say "ah well I reckon it's for the best."⁹

With the coming of the Civil War, Theodore volunteered for the elite fighting group in Muscogee County known as the Columbus Guards. The militia group had a rich history. It had fought valiantly in the Mexican War, and was further honored with the duty of escorting the Confederacy's President-elect, Jefferson Davis, to his inauguration in Montgomery, Alabama, on February 16, 1861. The Columbus Guards, later formally mustered into the Second Georgia Regiment, formed the backbone for many of Georgia's other fighting groups by providing officers for the newly organizing companies and regiments.¹⁰ Theodore and his younger brother, James, enlisted in the Columbus Guards, and in April they were promptly sent to camp on Georgia's coast to prepare for the impending fight with the Yankees.

From April 1861 to May 1864, while Theodore served in the Columbus Guards, he was limited in his rank to the position of a common soldier. He spent almost the entire war as a private, only obtaining the rank of lieutenant in 1864. It was ironic that he was not able to enlist with a commission, especially considering the fact that he had previous military experience at the Georgia Military Institute. At the age of twenty seven when he enlisted, Theodore was certainly not too young to receive a commission. However, he was forced to enter at the lowest rank primarily because the Columbus Guards began the war with a well-stocked officer corps. He joined the Rebel Army in a great rush for the much the same reason that many other volunteers' signed up. "Almost everyone seemed to think that the war would be decided by a battle or two in Virginia or Kentucky; it was necessary, therefore, to get to the fight with dispatch or run the risk of not making it at all."¹¹

Theodore's Civil War experience was divisible into three major spheres of activity; his camp life where he spent the vast majority of his days as a soldier, his trials on the battlefield where he consummated his loyalty to the Confederacy, and his inner struggle where war was waged between his deepest loyalties to his family and country. In each of these categories, Theodore's rank and position would suggest that he lived the life of the common soldier in the Civil War, but the redeeming aspects of Theodore's character shaped these experiences into what can only be described as an uncommon soldier's experience in the Civil War. Many of the characteristics that made Theodore Fogle a good man also made him into a good soldier.

In most aspects of camp life, Theodore conformed to the portrait of the average Confederate soldier. The only exceptions from this came when Theodore's values and morals coerced him to act differently from the stereotypical Johnny Reb. Begrudgingly, Theodore submitted to the daily duties associated with camp life. He frequently wrote home about the endless amount of time spent waiting, the troubles associated with cooking meals for his mess, and the relentless amount of drilling that the soldiers had to endure. However, when the common soldier opted to partake in the many vices that camp life offered, namely drinking, gambling or cussing, Theodore declined. He was painstakingly honest in his duty.

Like most common soldiers in the Confederate army, Theodore did not enjoy much of the hard and tedious labor that came with service. "I find it rather hard to do menial service such as bring wood & water, washing clothes...I find that if I furnish a negro...my work load will become easier."¹² He wrote to his father and proposed that one of the family slaves, Simon, be sent for him and his brother to share in camp. In support of his request, Theodore explained how this would effectively benefit them in two ways; by lessening both of their work loads in camp and by allowing them to gain financially through the payments from their messmates for Simon's work. Their father refused to send Simon because the family could not spare a slave. Theodore naturally agreed with the decision, but as the war progressed, he would request the services of his father's slaves several more times.

On July 29, 1861, the Columbus Guards made the trip from Georgia's coast to Richmond, Virginia. In his first letter home from the seat of the war, Theodore came to grips with the difficult journey from Georgia and the challenges that awaited him in Virginia;

I am just beginning to realize that I am a soldier, a number of times during the past three days my resolution almost failed & I was tempted to just lay down & give up, but after a little while my spirits rose again, the only way to be a soldier is to be ready to submit to any amount of fatigue & inconvenience, but it comes hard sometimes for young men who have been raised to do no menial labor & the only way to get along is to keep a stout heart, or as someone has elegantly expressed it 'keep a stiff upper lip.'¹³

Much was written about how the "long hours in camp were to bear heavily on the Confederate private."¹⁴ Nothing could be more true of Theodore's disdain for the tremendous amount of time that the Confederate army spent waiting. In September of 1861, eager for his first opportunity to fight, Theodore complained that "inaction is the hardest thing we poor fellows have to bear. You've no idea how trying it is to be in hearing of the enemy's guns & not be able to fight."¹⁵ Especially during the first year of the war, Theodore wrote home frequently about the pains of waiting. He even offered that an occasional reverse in military movement was better than just sitting idle. By referring to the lines of a Tennyson poem, Theodore effectively articulated his frustrating plight while in the position of a common soldier.

"Theirs not to make reply,"
"Theirs not to reason why,"
"Theirs but to do and die."¹⁶

However, Theodore was fairly content with his limited role as a private, even though his background at the Georgia Military Institute included much of the same drilling and discipline that the Confederate officers were teaching their volunteers. His complaint was not with his position in the Civil War, but rather, he was angered with the waste of time that came with his position. At Christmas in 1861, Theodore expressed his frustration at what he thought to be a lost opportunity for the Confederacy. His regiment, like many others was quickly trained and rushed to Virginia. But, they arrived a few days after the battle of Manassas had been decided. Consequently, his unit was not involved in any field operations until the spring of 1862. This forced the eager Rebs to wait almost a full year to get their first blows in on the Yankees. Theodore lamented, "we have accomplished literally nothing but just laid idle while the Yankees have raised & equipped one of the largest armies ever seen in modern times."¹⁷

Also like most Johnny Rebs, Theodore and his messmates were "notoriously bad cook(s)"¹⁸ at the outset of the war. Theodore recounted one of his adventures in cooking to his parents in August of 1861, "...today at dinner I killed & cleaned & fried three chickens..." After dipping the pieces in batter he "...fried them nicely brown, the boys couldn't see the feathers, & thought everything was right, a good appetite is blind to all deficiencies in cooking."¹⁹ Theodore and his brother James relied heavily upon food being delivered from home, especially during the first years of the war. Later in the war, to help in his preparation and gathering of food, Theodore finally bought a servant. In 1862 on the way to Sharpsburg, Maryland, the servant was especially helpful in gathering or foraging for food for Theodore. One explanation stated that Confederates used the term foraging "to dignify the practice known among civilians as stealing..."²⁰ Because the rations from camp were rapidly diminishing, Theodore and many other Confederate soldiers had to forage for their food or face starvation.

However, there were aspects to Theodore's experience in camp during the Civil War that shed light on this uncommon soldier's perspective. Among these was Theodore's refusal to participate in the immoral aspects of camp life, his remarkable endurance in his service to the Confederacy, and his highly honorable deportment during the entire war. These aspects, highlighted in his camp life, formed the fiber of Theodore's admirable character.

In search for reasons that would indicate why Theodore was such a pure man, it must be mentioned that he was religious, but he showed no signs of being affected by the religious revivals that swept through the Confederate camps periodically after the spring of 1863. His letters home relate to his reliance on religion in an indirect fashion. Examples of Theodore mentioning God were most often found after he returned safely from a traumatic experience on the battlefield. He would characteristically write, "only a kind Providence saved any of us alive."²¹ He never professed to be a deeply religious man, even though the values and morals that guided his life would suggest otherwise. He was simply a good man who refused to adopt the mindset that enabled Johnny Rebs to lapse into sinful behavior. "They might have been good boys when they left, and they would be good boys when they returned, but in the meantime they wanted to have a fling at gambling, drinking and swearing."²² He condemned those who drank liquor, never mentioned gambling, and admitted that he came close to swearing only once, out of anger at the Yankees.

Also, an important factor to consider in the analysis of Theodore's character was his age; he was twenty seven years old at the outbreak of the war. Because of this, he was more apt to carry himself in a serious manner and was therefore not as susceptible to the lure of vices that were so appealing to his younger comrades.

Another remarkable aspect about Theodore Fogle that furthered his image as the uncommon soldier in the Confederate army was his endurance in service. This characteristic showed up in his short-term and long-term duties. Theodore frequently wrote home that he was on the verge of quitting during some of the rigorous drills, but he never gave in to the desire. He also displayed a tremendous amount of endurance in his long-term service. Theodore did not take a furlough from the time of his enlistment until February of 1864. He criticized his fellow soldiers who shrank from duty by pretending to be sick. "Some few are on the sick list but their complaint is I think laziness."²³ Writing to his sister about his stamina, he said, "I am surprised at myself sometimes, I did not imagine I had such powers of endurance. Mother so often told me I was delicate that I really thought I was, but I stand more than nine tenths of the country chaps in our regiment..."²⁴

Other events related to his camp life helped to illuminate his noble character. During the journey from Savannah to Richmond, he and his brother lost all of their blankets, pants and underclothes. Even though they regularly received supplies in the form of food, equipment and clothes from their family, they decided to hold "a council of war' & concluded not to let the home folks know anything about it..."²⁵ They did not want to add to the burden of their already worried parents. On November 28, 1861, with wintertime quickly approaching, the two consented to request that blankets and underclothes be sent to them. To this, their parents quickly obliged. Early in the war, Theodore was able to apply his dental training when he was appointed "tooth puller to the regiment."²⁶ Instead of using the position for his own financial gain, he extracted every tooth free of charge. This type of humility was rare in the confederate army where it seemed that everyone, even a fellow soldier, was out to take money from the Rebels. However, it is also important to take note of Theodore's less than grown-up, but still admirable, quality of persistence displayed when he took advantage of a rare opportunity to attend a church service.

I put on a clean pair of pants, washed my face & hands for the first time in a week, combed my beard & hair, & off I started, got fifty yards from camp & found a mud puddle too broad to jump & too long to go around. I wanted to go to church but did not want to get muddy, but after a moments thought I jumped in & waded through the puddle, my pants & shoes were in beautiful condition but I was determined to go..."²⁷

Soldiers have always been eager for their first fight, but it is often commented that "the Confederate volunteers who rushed so impetuously to war in 1861 seemed to have been exceptionally zealous to come to blows with the enemy."²⁸ Theodore Fogle was one of those first volunteers and he possessed the same spirit for battle that was described, "I'm in for it now & will go willingly, I have no fear, & want to meet the Northern Scoundrels & help to give them a beating."²⁹ While Theodore was just a private, an ordinary foot soldier according to his rank, there was something different in his perception of the battles he experienced. At times he was ebullient with the spirit of the Rebel cause, and at other times he was solemnly introspective about the destruction and dying that was being inflicted around him. He was meticulous in recounting details about the positions and action during the battles. Always vigorously pronouncing his hatred of the Yankee forces, he rarely ever underestimated their ability as an army. Theodore's character diverged from the path of the stereotypical soldier with his heart wrenching sympathy for his comrades who died in the course of battle. Several times he retraced the steps of his regiment on the battlefield, replaying the action that his memory recorded in the heat of battle. Once a battle was completed, Theodore would enshrine the land on which the fight had raged as a sacred monument to those who gave their lives there.

During the course of the war, Theodore, like most Rebel soldiers, wrote home frequently to inform his family about the events on the battlefield. In the early stages of the war, he was not involved in any actual battles, but that did not hinder his correspondence relating to the fights he had missed. Theodore arrived only days after the Battle of First Manassas was decided. When he was able to get away from the drills and duties of camp, he went to the celebrated battlefield and wrote home the details,

Those who fell on our side were buried as decently as circumstances would permit but the Yankees were simply covered up, in most cases the legs & arms can be seen sticking out, some buried right where they fell, others buried forty to sixty in one grave ... the ground is now strown with cartridge papers, and there are numbers of white spots in the grass, where the blood of the Yankees was shed, it had a singular effect, it killed the grass where it fell...³⁰

Theodore also sent home battle field memorabilia found at Manassas including minnie balls and flowers. During the fall of 1861, Theodore's regiment was on the fringe of involvement in several fights with the Yankees, but each time they were held in a reserve capacity and the opportunity fell short. The intense desire to be involved in battle was boiling over for Theodore, as it had been since the summer months, "I have been feeling kinder ferocious for a week or two. Hope we will have a chance at the Yankees soon. I want to vent my spite against them instead of letting it vent itself on innocent objects."³¹ When he learned that Yankee forces had captured two forts in South Carolina, one very close to his regiment's training camp at Tybee Island, Georgia, Theodore blasted the Yankees with heated rhetoric, "I am in favor of going down there & hoisting the black flag. 'No quarter to invaders' should be the motto, oh the infernal scoundrels, I do so long to get at them, every day I hate them more and more..."³² His condemnation of the Yankees was relentless. It continued in October of 1861, when he wrote to his parents that his goal in fighting the Federals was not limited to just beating them on the battlefield, but instead, he asked that "God help the poor wretches, if they will fight us I want as many killed as possible."³³

But, Theodore was not always the hawkish Rebel soldier that many of his letters portrayed during the first year of the war. He had visited battlefields and talked with those who fought there, but he had not experienced "the Baptism of Fire," yet.³⁴ Still, though, he exhibited a tremendous amount of sympathy for his fellow soldiers who died in service. While he continued to hate the Yankees, a new sense of sympathy and remorse emerged for the plight of the fallen Confederate soldier, but also in a broader sense, for the brutality that was associated with war on both sides. In February of 1862, while in winter quarters in sight of the Manassas Battlefield, he wrote,

This is a bright beautiful day, the ground is covered with about three inches of snow, how beautiful it is, it seems as if nature wanted to cover the battle field, that woeful monument of the sad effect of men's passions, with a pure white mantle as if to hide it from sight.³⁵

After his first fight, Theodore's letter home did not focus on condemning the infernal scoundrels on the Yankee's side of the battle field, but instead, he wrote to his parents, "thank God ... I am safe. I have become accustomed to the whistle of musket and cannon balls. I don't care about them at all, so they don't hit me."³⁶ In August of 1862, his zealous Rebel spirit combined with his ever-present knowledge that death could take him at any moment on the battle field. "...When the Southern blood is up it is hard to control it, we could have accomplished so much ... true I might have been killed, but I have been expecting that in every battle I have ever been in..."³⁷

Theodore credited God for seeing him safely through battle. It was a simple allegiance. He only mentioned God or Providence in his letters after an extremely harrowing experience on the battlefield. His letter on August 31, 1862, after the Battle of Second Manassas provided his most frightful experience while in the line of fire.

Thank God I am safe....Yesterday a piece of shell or a grape shot passed along, cut my haversack & just grazed my right hip, didn't hurt me atall, but tore my haversack badly ... Oh mother a merciful God has wonderful preserved me. Men were shot down all around me, balls & missiles of every kind whistled by but I never got a scratch.³⁸

Throughout the war, Theodore would participate in other major battles, including: Antietam, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, and the Wilderness. He was constantly aware that incidents like the grazing shot at Stone Bridge in the Battle of Second Manassas could cause his death on the battlefield. Theodore addressed the problems associated with field combat by simplistically stating. "...I intend to get a place out of the field if I possible can, bullets are not good for my health, an excess of them may prove fatal."³⁹

Theodore had tremendous love for his family and his country. The devotion to his family can be seen in the more than two hundred letters that he wrote home during the course of the war. His dedication to the Confederacy can be seen in his unyielding service which spanned over three and one-half years. However, the loyalties for his family and country would eventually come into direct conflict. It would be a grueling experience for Theodore. He desperately wanted to continue his duty to the Confederacy, but the length of the conflict had exceeded his expectations, and he was forced to grapple with his other loyalty, his family. This conflict was highlighted in 1862 when Theodore's twelve month term as a volunteer was nearly completed, but the Confederate Congress had not yet enacted the conscription Act. Theodore's letters revealed his inner struggle. To pursue either cause would have been consistent with his noble character, but for a brief period, it seemed that he must decide between the two. Initially, Theodore pledged that he wanted to come home immediately after his term of service expired, but as that time neared, his heart was warmed by the fires of patriotism and his loyalties became clouded.

Furloughs were hard to obtain in the early parts of the war. In his letters home, Theodore constantly referred to his applications being turned down or merely not allowed to be processed. With his characteristic sense of optimism, Theodore noted, after a failed application in July of 1861, "the parting (from home) would be worse than it was at first, so it would perhaps be best not to see you all atall."⁴⁰ His emotions for home were a constant theme in the letters to his family. "I have several times caught myself repeating the line 'Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.'"⁴¹

Theodore longed for mail from his family. Once, after more than a few days had passed and he had not received any news from home, the mail bag finally held some letters for him. His deep affection for his family was demonstrated by his emotions upon receiving the mail, "I went to my tent by myself & spent such a happy hour, the tears would come, I could not help it. Your letter Mother & Father ... seemed more loving than ever..."⁴² In his letters home, Theodore was very protective of what his mother might read. If a letter contained any information that might upset her, Theodore addressed it to his father, who would judge if his mother could read it. Such was the case when Theodore wrote that he had accidentally shot, but only slightly injured, a vegetable salesman in camp while on Tybee Island in 1861. And the process was the same whenever Theodore had to write that a family member was sick or otherwise troubled. In September of 1861, Theodore wrote to calm his mother, who was upset over having sent three sons to the war, "don't trouble yourself mother unnecessarily about your boys ... pray that we may all meet again & that peace may soon be made, for as long as the war lasts young men must stay away from their homes & try to render their country some service."⁴³ Theodore loved writing letters to his parents nearly as much as he enjoyed receiving mail from them. "Sometimes I fear you all will weary of my letters, they come so often ... somehow I have for the past two or three months had a perfect mania for writing, my only happy moments are when I am writing to you all or reading your letters..."⁴⁴

Theodore always had plans in the making for a furlough home. In December of 1861, he hoped for but was realistically not expecting a chance to go home during winter quarters. Frustrated by the uncooperative system, Theodore lamented, "it is very hard for an honest man to get a furlough. I could get home if I chose to tell a few lies but of course you will not expect me to do anything of that kind."⁴⁵ While he would not submit to the dishonest tactics such as pretending to be sick, concocting terrible news from home that required immediate personal attention or just outright defecting from service, Theodore still hoped for some honest circumstances that would propel him in the homeward direction. "I am getting very anxious to see home but there is no way to get there except through the means of disease or a Yankee bullet, a wound through the fleshy part of the leg or arm would be a delightful thing now."⁴⁶

From late 1861 until the spring of 1862, re-enlistment crisis highlighted the conflict between Theodore's loyalty to his country and family. His rhetoric at the outset of the crisis accentuated his deep affection for his family and home, but the emotions gradually changed and the conflict between his loyalties was not so clear. Theodore did not want to make the decision whether to re-enlist or not. In the typical fashion for the member of a patriarchal family, he deferred the choice to his father's judgement. At the age of twenty-eight, this might have appeared immature, but Theodore still lived in a patriarchal family environment which called for such major decisions to be made by the head of the family. Theodore was his father's first son, he followed in his father's professional footsteps as a dentist, he counted on his father for supplies, and he addressed letters that contained potentially upsetting information to his father. There was no reason to assume that Theodore would make such a major decision by himself. "The authority of the father structured patriarchal families. The rich connotations of fatherhood - source, provider, protector, example, and judge - infused patriarchal authority with legitimacy."⁴⁷

In late November of 1861, Theodore was intent upon returning to Columbus after his twelve month period of service had expired. He condemned the newspapers for attempting to pressure the volunteers into re-enlisting. The newspapers said that "everyone who refuses to do so will be considered a Union man & a traitor to his country," but Theodore disagreed wholeheartedly, "now those editors who talk that way are fools..."⁴⁸ He also began to show the frustration that existed with his position and low rank in the army. "... a private soldier is nothing more than a slave & is often treated worse, I have during the past six months gone through more hardships than any one of our's or Grandma's negroes..."⁴⁹ He appeared resolute in his decision not to re-enlist. "...if I live through his term of enlistment. I will never enlist again, I won't make a slave of myself, - if I go to the wars at all it will be as an independent ... and fight on my own."⁵⁰

He knew that strenuous efforts would be made to encourage the volunteers to re-enlist, but such pleas would fall on deaf ears with Theodore. In February of 1862, he wrote home about rumors that the government would be pressing the volunteers into service for the spring campaigns. Even though he was frustrated with the action, he knew that there was nothing he could do "...but submit ... Many things are done in time of war which are not right in themselves but are only made so by circumstances."⁵¹

Surprisingly only five days later, in a letter to his father, Theodore exhibited a totally different attitude towards re-enlistment. The conflict between his loyalty to family and the Confederacy had come to a head.

I have taken a step which may or may not meet with your approval. I have made or intend to make today an application for a Lieutenancy in the Georgia Regulars ... I thought it best to have 'an iron in the fire' so that if I am forced into the service after my present term of enlistment expires I can have a commission. In the present crisis our country needs the services of every man & particularly those who have by a previous term of service become disciplined.⁵²

He was now applying for a commission. But, it was impossible for him to make such a major decision on his own. He gave the decision making powers to his father, but also hinted that re-enlistment might have some advantages for the family. Theodore pledged that he would send half of his salary as an officer home to his father. He also pointed out that even if he were able to come home, it would only be for a few months. Invariably, he would be called back into the army. Theodore sounded much more like a man who wanted to stay in the Confederate army than one who wanted to leave as soon as possible. As he made his case for staying in the service, the tension in the decision making process was transferred from his competing loyalties of country and family to the ever-present tension between father and son. So, Theodore presented his provisional plan, and waited to hear his father's reply.

After waiting for weeks, Theodore finally received his father's reply that "two sons from one family are enough."⁵³ With his two brothers still fighting for the Confederacy, Theodore was summoned home by his father when his term expired. Theodore's nationalistic emotions would not allow him to submit so easily to his father's words. "It is hard even now for me to come to any decision, the need for men seems so urgent that it is not easy for me to leave the service without doing violence to my ideas of patriotism..."⁵⁴

As it turned out, Theodore would not have to make a choice on either issue; his promotion was denied and the Confederate Congress kept him from going home by passing the Conscription Act in April of 1862. Other events proved to be just as ironic as his two brothers would be out of the Confederate army within four months of his re-enlistment. On June 20, 1862, Theodore's brother, James, resigned from the Columbus Guards to study medicine and on July 19, 1862, Theodore's other brother, William, resigned his commission because of Rheumatism. Theodore stayed on the battlefield until February of 1864, when, after five applications, his furlough was finally accepted.⁵⁵ Later in 1864, Theodore received his commission as a Lieutenant in Georgia's Second Regiment.

Theodore returned from his thirty day furlough on time. His personal honor would not allow him to consider "desertion, or overstaying of leaves"⁵⁶ that had become so prevalent with other soldiers during the late stages of the war. Soon after his return, the Columbus Guards fought in the Wilderness Campaign. Less than a month after he returned from his furlough home, Theodore Fogle was killed on the battlefield at the Wilderness on May 6, 1864. The eulogy of a fallen rebel soldier exemplified the tragedy associated with Theodore Fogle's death by describing him as "truly the 'good soldier' of the 'lost cause.'" How tragic for the Confederacy that there were not more like him. In the months that followed his death, the morale of both citizens and troops came to be in ever sharper contrast to the loftiness of the spirit exemplified by (Theodore), until on the eve of Appomattox evaders and absentees far outnumbered soldiers who were present for duty."⁵⁷

Theodore was an uncommon soldier in the Confederate army. His personal integrity molded an experience in the Civil War that was distinctive from the common soldier's. In camp, Theodore was a solid soldier. He never succumbed to the temptations that the vices of drinking, gambling, and swearing offered the Rebel soldiers. He possessed the type of endurance that delighted his commanding officers. Never would he quit during the most rigorous drill. He also possessed great stamina for enduring such a long period of service without a furlough home. He always conducted himself with the same sense of gentlemanly deportment in tasks ranging from extracting teeth free of charge for fellow soldiers to cooking food for his mess mates.

Theodore was an ardent Southern nationalist. He abhorred the Yankees, but he respected their military force. The battlefield provided an arena where Theodore could put his harsh language against the Yankees into action. He was involved in many battles, and his outlook on the war changed in the process. Once he was tempered by the horrors of the battlefield, Theodore was more apt to lament the death of Rebel soldiers than he was to harshly condemn the Yankees. He wrote home about the action on the battlefield, even recounting some of his close calls with Yankee shots. Usually, he displayed his cautious personality by hesitating to report to his mother the full details of the battlefield until the text of his letter had been read by his father.

It was a great tragedy for his country and family that Theodore was killed on the battlefield. He entered the war with great excitement for a chance to fight the Yankees. However, he also had deep feelings for his family. He was very fond of receiving mail from his family members. As for his part, Theodore wrote over two hundred letters home in a time period of three and one half years. The two loyalties were the source of great internal conflict for Theodore in the spring of 1862. He grappled with the decision to re-enlist or come home, deferred the choice between the two to his father, but eventually was forced to stay in the army when the Confederate Congress passed the Conscription Act. He eventually received his commission as a Lieutenant, but it was only months before he was tragically killed in battle.

Theodore Fogle was an outstanding man and he became an outstanding soldier for the Confederate army. Even though he was regulated to the rank of a Private most of the war, he provided an example of how personal integrity and values can shape a man's life, even in the most common of experiences. Theodore's inspiring demeanor while in camp, his heart touching introspection when writing about the battlefield, and his deep loyalties to his family and country, provided the foundation for the evaluation of a man's truly inspirational experience while in the most common setting in the Civil War.

Statistics of the State of Georgia -
Harris County

The following is taken from White, George, Statistics of the State of Georgia...Savannah: W. Thoone Williams, 1849. A section such as this is included for each Georgi County in existence at that time. Other counties will be featured in future issues of Muscogiana.

Boundaries, Extent.--This county has Troup and Meriwether on the N., Talbot on the E., Muscogee on the S., and the Chattahoochee on the W. Laid out from Troup and Muscogee, in 1827. Length 20 miles, breadth 18 miles; 360 square miles.

Rivers, Creeks.--The Chattahoochee forms the western boundary of the county. West End, Standing Boy, Sowahachee, Mulberry, Flat Shoal, Old House, and Mountain Creeks, empty into the Chattahoochee.

Post Offices.--Hamilton, Cochran's Cross Roads, Ellerslie, Mulberry Grove, King's Gap, Piedmont, Waverly Hall, Whitesville, Valley Place.

Population, Taxes, Representation.--Population in 1845, 7,166 whites, 6,972 blacks; total, 14,138. Amount of State tax returned for 1848, $4,922.49. Sends two representatives to the Legislature.

Towns.--Hamilton is the seat of justice, two miles north of Mulberry Creek, at the extremity of the Oak mountain, and one mile south of the Pine mountain. It is a small place, surrounded by beautiful scenery. Population about 400. It contains a pretty court-house, a jail, two churches, one male school, one female school. Amount of goods sold per annum, $50,000. It is healthy, and the water good. Distant from Milledgeville 100 miles; from Columbus 22 1/2 miles; from Talbotton 22 1/2; from Greeneville, 22 1/2; from LaGrange, 22 1/2; from West Point, 22 1/2; and 11 from Whitesville. Incorporated and made the county site in 1828.

Whitesville is on the road leading directly from Columbus to LaGrange. Population 150. Distant from Columbus 27 miles.

Valley Place, 10 miles N. E. of Hamilton, in the valley between the Oak and Pine Mountains. One church, one school, two stores, &c.

Cochran's, 7 miles N. of Hamilton.

Ellerslie, 10 miles S. E. of Hamilton.

Religious Sects.--Methodist, Baptists, and Presbyterians.

Education.--This subject is generally appreciated, and schools are established in nearly every portion of the county.

Mills.--Merchant-mills,	3
Grist-mills,	6
Saw-mills,	8
Distilleries	2

Productions.--The productions are similar to those of Troup and the adjoining counties. Cotton averages 500 pounds per acre. Corn averages 4 barrels per acre. Wheat from 10 to 12 bushels per acre.

MUSCOGIANA, VOL. 3, NOS. 1 & 2

Markets, Cotton.--Columbus and Griffin. Eight thousand bales of cotton are annually produced.

Face of the Country, Nature of the Soil, Value of Land.--There is much variety in the face of the country. The Pine mountains enter the county near the N. E. corner. The Oak mountains enter the county at its eastern corner. Above the Pine mountains, east of the road leading to Columbus, the country is level, having a thin, light soil, productive but not lasting. West of the road, from Columbus to LaGrange, it is a broken, rich country, heavily timbered. As you approach the Pine mountains it assumes a rocky and knolly aspect. In the valley between the Oak and Pine mountains the soil is gray; growth, Spanish oak and hickory. South of the Oak mountain, upon the head waters of Mulberry creek, and extending all the way down said creek, the soil is rich.

Improved lands are worth $5.00 per acre. Unimproved lands from 3 to 4 dollars per acre.

Character of the People.--The citizens of Harris are clever and spirited. In morality, intelligence, and benevolence, they are upon an equality with the people of the adjoining counties.

Early settlers.--W. C. Osborn, W. Switzer, Hon. M. J. Welborn, John Greer, N. Barden, S. Clay, R. R. Brown, Gen. McDougald, Gen. Low, and others.

Minerals.--Gold has been found in the Pine mountains, and most of the minerals which exist in the adjacent counties are found in Harris.

Bridges and Roads.--Nothing very favourable can be said of the bridges and roads. Their condition would be improved by more attention on the part of the citizens.

Climate.--There is nothing which distinguishes the climate from that of the neighbouring counties. In the mountains the air is cool and invigorating. The diseases are such as commonly prevail in western Georgia. Among the cases of longevity we have learned the following. There are now living Mr. Arthur Redding, over 80; Mr. W. Swann, over 80; Mr. McCraw, 90.

There are two or three Indian mounds on Mulberry Creek.

Name.--Charles Harris, Esq., after whom this county was named, was born in England in the year 1772, and received his education in France. He came to Georgia in 1788, and studied law in the office of Samuel Stirk, Esquire, and gradually rose to high distinction in his profession. He was regarded by many as the most profound lawyer in the State. His reasoning powers were great. He neither aimed at ornament nor eloquence. As an evidence of his great reputation as a lawyer, it may be stated that he was employed in the city of Washington, in an appeal case of great importance from the Court of Admiralty in Georgia, a large fee of five thousand dollars being given to him. Wm. Pinckney and Wm. Wirt, two lawyers of great celebrity, were associated with him, and such was his modesty, that although his pecuniary resources were very limited, he gave to the above-named gentlemen one thousand dollars each out of his fee. When the case came before the court, Mr. Pinckney rose and said, that Mr. Wirt and himself had concluded that nothing they could say to the court could possibly be necessary, or add any weight to the masterly reasoning given in the brief by the gentleman from Georgia. The brief was then read by Mr. Pinckney, and the decision of the court given in favour of the client of Mr. Harris.

Mr. Harris was a gentleman of uncommon modesty, and although importuned in the most earnest manner to accept of honours offered to him by his fellow-citizens, with the exception of those of Alderman and Mayor of Savannah, in one or the other of which offices he served for more than twenty years, he could not be prevailed upon to do so. More than once did he refuse the highest offices in the gift of the people of Georgia. Gov. Jackson appointed him Judge of the Eastern Circuit, without consulting him; Mr. Harris, however, anxious as he was to gratify his friend, declined the appointment, from a belief that the discharge of its duties would frequently call him from the enjoyment of the domestic circle, to which he was remarkably devoted.

A year or two afterwards, whilst he was still a young man, he was elected by the Legislature of Georgia, Judge of the Eastern Circuit, without his solicitation or that of his friends, but he would not consent to take the appointment. When the retirement of Mr. Milledge from the Senate of the United States rendered it necessary to fill the vacancy, although there were many aspirants to this distinguished office, the Legislature and both parties (Crawford and Clarke) united in the selection of Mr. Harris, if he would serve. An express was sent to Savannah to ascertain his views, but he positively refused the honour. A short time afterwards, ill health, the loss of his wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, and other domestic afflictions, caused him gradually to seek retirement, and he lost that tone of feeling which had given delight to all who had the happiness of his acquaintance. He died March 17th 1827, lamented by all classes of people.

Mr. Harris was rather above the middle stature. His manners were affable and pleasing. His benevolence was proverbial. When the widow saw him she blessed him. When the orphans saw him they were glad. Widows, orphans, the distressed, and the poor, looked up to him as a friend, whom they might approach at any time. Mr. Harris was of a highly respectable family. His father was William Harris, barrister, who was first cousin of Lord Malmesbury. His mother was the sister of the hereditary Champion of England, Charles Dymock, who attended the coronation of George the Third, and his father was one of the two squires of the Champion who attended the coronation. The Dymocks were a branch of the DeBergs, who had been Champions of England from the accession of the Norman family.

Confederate Hospitals in Columbus, Georgia

By
Sandra White Uzar

When Atlanta was occupied and burned by Sherman's forces, the evacuation of sick and wounded soldiers was urgent. Many exiles came to Columbus from Atlanta and Eastern Georgia. S. H. Stout, Medical Director of the Army of Tennessee, ordered outfits under his command moved from Macon and Barnesville to Columbus in October, 1864. The entire line of hospitals on the Atlanta Road, from Augusta to West Point, had been abandoned because of occupation by the enemy. Since Columbus had been designated as the site of a 1,500-bed army hospital in February, 1864, it was only logical that the sick and wounded be moved. It was also chosen because of its "relatively safe distance from the main - line action."¹

With the first battles of the war came the inevitable problem of caring for the sick and wounded soldiers. The women in the area responded promptly to meet the crisis created. Even though the government assumed the task of directing these hospitals, the women retained a large portion of the burden of supplying their needs and performing useful functions as volunteer nurses, matrons, and supervisors - needs that may otherwise have been neglected. (A matron is defined as a person who will "call on the steward for whatever the patient's appetite calls for, see that it is prepared to suit his taste, feed him herself if he's too feeble to do so, bathe his fevered brow, comb his hair.")² It wasn't until the fall of 1862 that Confederate recruits were even examined on a regular basis for physical fitness, and then the test was primarily whether a soldier was strong enough to march. Of approximately 50 hospitals in Georgia, Columbus was home to 10 of these. Some of these were saloons, stores, and even part of the courthouse. These and others were quickly converted into hospital facilities. The former Broad Street mercantile stores were converted into what was christened "Lee Hospital". One of the largest hospitals was built on the edge of town on the site of Camp Montgomery, an 1861 training ground for troops. Temperance Hall, which was one of the first schools for Negroes, was used for "hospital purposes" during the war.³ The Columbus Wayside Home was converted into a transient hospital during the Atlanta Campaign because it was close to the railroads and large enough to house many men.

The approximate location of each hospital is as follows:

1. C. S. Hospital - SW corner Broad St./Bryan St. (no 13th St.)
2. C. H. Hospital - SE corner Front St./St. Clair St. (now 11th St.)
3. First Soldiers Home - NE corner Broad St./Thomas St. (now 9th St.)
4. C. S. Hospital (Courthouse) - Oglethorpe St. (now 1st Ave.) between Crawford St. and Thomas St. (now 9th/10th St.)
5. Walker Hospital - NW corner Broad St./Crawford St. (now 10th St.)
6. R. E. Lee Hospital - Randolph St. (now 12th St.) between Front St. and Broad St.
7. C. S. Hospital - "Rooney Building", 1135 Broad St.
8. Soldiers Home - located near train depot.
9. Temperance Hall - Oglethorpe St. (now 1st Ave.) Bryan St. (now 13th St.)
10. Cairns Hospital - above 19th St./between 2nd and 4th Ave. to 20 St.

Mrs. Absalom H. Chappel was the first president of the "Soldiers' Aid Society" to care for the sick and wounded soldiers during the initial stages of the war. Women here not only tended to the sick and wounded soldiers but also clothed the dead for their burial and in some cases even attended them to their graves. One of its most useful members was Mrs. Lizzie Rutherford Ellis. She is described as a woman of "great energy, and an indefatigable worker."⁴

This society later was known as the "Ladies Soldier's Friend Society" and renamed again, in the spring of 1866, the "Ladies Memorial Association". Mrs. Robert Carter was its first president.

The "Battlefield Relief Association" was organized in the summer of 1864 as a gentlemen's auxiliary to the "Ladies Soldier's Friend Society". They supervised the collection of additional clothing and food for the sick and wounded. Requests were frequently made by the Battlefield Relief Association to the residents of Columbus for "donations of articles necessary for the relief of the sick and wounded in the Army of Tennessee."⁵

When private contributions became scarce, concerts and plays were held at Temperance Hall. Traveling theatrical companies, choral groups singing patriotic songs, and a noted Columbus slave known as "Blind Tom" frequently gave benefit performances for aid to the sick and wounded. Since entertainment was scarce during the war, these proved to be quite popular.

By May 1864 more than 1,350 patients were being attended to in Columbus. Dr. Francis Orray Ticknor was the Chief Surgeon. He later became a notable Georgia poet because of his touching poem "Little Giffen of Tennessee". This poem was based upon the actual case of 16-year-old Isaac Newton Giffen whom Ticknor cared for in his home at "Torch Hill". Giffen recovered from his wounds, went back to front-line action, and was never heard from again.

Meals for the patients were prepared by Negro orderlies using brick ovens behind Lee Hospital. A reporter from the Enquirer stated the patients were allowed meat twice a day, and the hams and bacon were declared "superior to civilian gods."⁶ In a notice "To The Public", citizens of Columbus and vicinity were warned against "representations of straggling inmates of the local hospitals, who represent they don't get enough to eat."⁷ Senior Surgeon in Charge of Hospitals, George B. Douglas, stated that "full rations of good and wholesome food are issued daily and that anyone 'desirous of being informed' of the facts stated could visit the hospitals at the regular meal time."⁸ The Soldiers Friend wrote an article to the local newspaper in mid-1864 to rebuke what appears to be "occasional allusions" to the quality of food in the local hospitals.⁹ The article stated that "comparative abundance" is available locally in comparison to other hospitals.¹⁰ An article entitled "Hospitals Abroad" states that if Confederate soldiers spent some time in other hospitals (notably - Lynchburg, VA), they would "quell their murmuring" here because of a so-called lack of quality and quantity of food.¹¹ On June 26, 1864, an appeal was made through the local newspaper for more vegetables for distribution among the sick and wounded.

The hospitals suffered from a shortage of many supplies, equipment, and medicine. Frequently, the women of Columbus brought items from their own homes to use. Columbus was fortunate in being an Eastern Hospital because, although the hospitals of the Eastern States lacked supplies, delicacies, and at times, even the plainest food, those in the West lacked more, and severe suffering ensued. The western hospitals were further removed from supply centers for surgical appliances, instruments, and medicine. These items were considered contraband by the union forces.

Dr. Carlisle Terry appealed to the ladies of Columbus for contributions of "old clothes, linens, and cotton lint,"¹² for the use of the many wounded who had arrived, with the anticipation of more to follow. Despite the shortage of equipment and supplies, the Confederate medical service "performed as well as its Northern counterparts" and "perhaps on occasion demonstrated better judgment," particularly in the more serious use of medical boards to examine prospective surgeons for the regular and provisional army.¹³

Since early 1861, the women of Columbus had collected food and rolled bandages for hospitals in Virginia. The women of Columbus did much for the disabled soldier that was useful, satisfying and showed deep compassion. The "feminine touch" revolutionized the care of the sick and wounded. The soldiers, who were almost always far from their families, were grateful whenever these ladies came into the wards because they would write letters to their families, pray with them, wipe the sweat from their brows, and "closed the eyes of dead."¹⁴ A surgeon in charge of one of the principal hospitals in Columbus stated that every soldier brought down from the Army of Tennessee whose wounds proved fatal had died "perfectly happy."¹⁵ Federal prisoners were treated equally well. Locally, the soldiers were dying at the rate of "five and upwards" a day.¹⁶

A reading room, centrally located to the hospitals, was proposed by Rev. George Stickney to furnish a "pleasant resort" for the convalescents of the hospitals.¹⁷ Books and periodicals were contributed by many local citizens.

Money to operate these hospitals was appropriated by the local council. According to published reports, in general, these hospitals were "neatly kept and the patients contented and cheerful."¹⁸ The Hospital Headquarters at Columbus eventually established subsidiaries in Opelika and Tuscumbia, Alabama.

In April, 1865, with the impending assault of Federal forces upon Columbus, the patients were moved back to Atlanta where the last official order of the Medical Department was issued from there on April 27, 1865. It was the "mobility" of the Civil War hospitals that kept them in existence - even if it meant "discomfort" to the patients.¹⁹

In honor of those who lost their lives to the cause of the Confederacy, Miss Lizzie Rutherford suggested a day be set aside as a memorial. "Memorial Day" was first observed on April 26, 1866. According to Miss Anna Caroline Benning, the North celebrates a later Memorial Day than does the South because flowers bloom later there and flowers (always fresh) are "the essence of this hallowed tradition."²⁰

The City of Columbus, Georgia*

June 27, 1921

The names listed below are of Columbus women who were registered to vote as of June 27, 1921. The list has been taken from "List of Registered Voters of Columbus, Ga., June 27, 1921", an 84-page publication put out by the city. The alphabetical list is divided into four categories. The first and largest of these is an untitled list of white male voters. Second, is a list of registered "women voters", which includes only white women. Third, is a three-page list of "colored men voters", and last, a five-page list of "colored women voters."

The booklet, which is probably the first published Columbus voter registration listing to contain the names of female voters, is part of the A. C. Smith Collection, which is housed in the Columbus College Archives.
